I must admit, I expected Photoshop to have some better organization – such as an inventory of images by session, keyword, location etc. So, I was extremely impressed by how almost all the folders are still there, and that they are at least organized and clean. I am now very happy to see that Lightroom made further revisions in the way it works. Lightroom still does not automatically organize the images you import, but that is refreshingly modest in comparison to previous versions. Instead, the app now offers two new tools – Faces and Regions – to help organize images a bit more. Faces works by more or less automatically creating “tags”, using an auto-generated person tag for each unique face in the image. As a result, you will greatly increase the efficiency of creating keywords by using this app. Being able to place faces into a keyword is the perfect metaphor for how this app helps you to the organize your trove of images. I also like that you can sort your images date-wise if you so choose. I’ve found that I usually do not like grouping the images, I tend to look at them and analyze them as they are because I am not always able to put them into a particular category. Moreover, I have just come to realize that using Faces and Regions makes the creation of keywords an easier go-ahead, because there is no reason to do manually and it’s fairly obvious why I would use a Face or Region keyword over any other keyword, based on which particular face or region I am trying to categorize. This “natural sorting” of images by faces or regions is a thoughtful, though not revolutionary feature for an image browser.

But it still comes equipped with hundreds of features. The first thing that I personally like about the GIMP is the ability to paste images together. You can select multiple images by Ctrl+LMB, and drag them into my clipboard. Then you can lift out peaces of different images and place them on top of the other to view them together.
