For some players it feels like the heroes need to be dead in order for them to be used in most games. I, like many, used to think that death was the only way for the heroes to be used. Usually in order to get the NPC's that they need to go along with a quest. In my experience, that was where the hero usually died off to in the Hero Quest format. However, in most games I play, especially the larger ones, they don't die. Yes, in the larger games the hero is normally given a mission to complete before getting into the bigger battles, but in those cases the hero is usually given a mission and just leaves to complete it. But not always. For example, in Tales of Destiny the heroes are responsible for their own actions. They don't always have to complete missions set by others. They are given the choice to go about on their own or follow the directions of the AI. In this case, they can even die in any situation. One of the easiest ways for the hero to die is being dead in a dungeon. There is one exception to this however. Unless you are playing your own game, it is almost always set up like this: The hero(s) plays as a separate character from the campaign. Usually after defeating the villain or demons or the like in the final battle. The hero(s) is still given missions along the way, and will probably take quests from towns, people, or NPC's, which could be monsters, bosses, or just NPCs, but that's actually dependant on what they need done. Now, as in Tales of Destiny, you can have the hero(s) die in any situation you want. I think it depends on the GM. They decide, as a group, how the player characters should act. Some groups want it to be more interactive, where the characters make their own choices as to what they do. Others are pretty much following a book, and the GM makes the decisions.
